Clarification regarding medical student retention at McGill University

OTTAWA, Sept. 4 2012 – In the midst of Québec’s provincial election, there has been some confusion regarding a supposed exodus of medical students from McGill University.

François Legault, leader of the Coalition Avenir Québec, has claimed that approximately 50% of McGill medical students leave the province after they graduate. However, statistics from the Canadian Resident Matching Service (CaRMS) demonstrate otherwise. Among graduates from McGill’s Class of 2012, only 32% left the province to pursue residency training elsewhere. This compares favourably to a number of Canadian schools, including University of British Columbia (52%), Memorial University of Newfoundland (47%), and University of Calgary (45%). In fact, McGill ranks 10th among Canada’s 17 medical schools in terms of retaining postgraduate physicians within the province.

Data from McGill University also show that 75% of medical residents remain in Québec following the completion of their postgraduate training. This includes students from elsewhere in Canada who migrate to Québec to complete their training.

Ensuring an adequate supply of physicians is instrumental to the health of Québec residents. However, Mr. Legault’s concern regarding McGill medical students is not borne out by the facts. McGill’s medical students, along with the Canadian Federation of Medical Students (CFMS) support McGill
